TREE RINGS CLEW TO HISTORY AND WEATHER

Life Story is Revealed in Own Cross-Section

Washington.—Announcement by Dr. A. E. Douglass, of the University of Arizona, that the study of the rings of trees is a new method of determining the history of the weather during the past century, has attracted considerable attention.

This method was used in connection with the study of the weather during the past century, and the results are being published in the "Annals of the Association of American Geographers."

Dr. Douglass, who is a member of the National Geographic Society, has been studying the rings of trees for many years, and has found that they contain a record of the weather during the past century.

He has found that the rings of trees are wider in years when the weather is wet and narrower in years when the weather is dry.

He has also found that the rings of trees are wider in years when the weather is warm and narrower in years when the weather is cold.

He has found that the rings of trees are wider in years when the weather is sunny and narrower in years when the weather is cloudy.

He has found that the rings of trees are wider in years when the weather is calm and narrower in years when the weather is stormy.

He has found that the rings of trees are wider in years when the weather is clear and narrower in years when the weather is hazy.

He has found that the rings of trees are wider in years when the weather is bright and narrower in years when the weather is dim.

He has found that the rings of trees are wider in years when the weather is pleasant and narrower in years when the weather is disagreeable.

He has found that the rings of trees are wider in years when the weather is good and narrower in years when the weather is bad.

He has found that the rings of trees are wider in years when the weather is fine and narrower in years when the weather is foul.

He has found that the rings of trees are wider in years when the weather is beautiful and narrower in years when the weather is ugly.

He has found that the rings of trees are wider in years when the weather is lovely and narrower in years when the weather is hateful.

He has found that the rings of trees are wider in years when the weather is charming and narrower in years when the weather is repulsive.

He has found that the rings of trees are wider in years when the weather is delightful and narrower in years when the weather is detestable.

He has found that the rings of trees are wider in years when the weather is exquisite and narrower in years when the weather is atrocious.

He has found that the rings of trees are wider in years when the weather is superb and narrower in years when the weather is abominable.

He has found that the rings of trees are wider in years when the weather is magnificent and narrower in years when the weather is detestable.
